PASCAL JOLIVET Sancerre
France
645

After World War II, the Sancerrois made a concerted effort to popularize the wine in the bistros of Paris. Their ingenious plan was to demand a glass of Sancerre everywhere they went. The plan worked. Today Sancerre is one of the most famous French wines in the world, not just in Paris.

Wine Hack: 'Crémant' indicates a French sparkling wine made using the same labour-intensive process used in Champagne but comes from a different (and less famous) region. Expect excellent quality but at a lower price point! Great value, unique style of French sparkling.

Pinot Noir is often known as the heartbreak grape among winemakers; its thin skins make it easily damaged. But those thin skins are also responsible for its coveted lightness and easy-drinking texture.

JEAN-PIERRE MOUEIX, Pomerol
Bordeaux, France

Pomerol is one of the smallest regions in Bordeaux at approximately 3km by 4km. Production is limited and in high demand due partly to excellent quality and partly to its fame. If being served at Queen Elizabeth II's wedding banquet didn't make it a pop culture hit, then President JFK's declaration that his favourite wine came from Pomerol did.

Tempranillo is Spain's most important grape, but some historians suggest that it came from the Middle East and may have been brought to Spain by the Phoenicians, an ancient civilization who lived in modern-day Lebanon and Syria.

No disrespect to the chef, but the tastiest mushrooms you'll have today are in this bottle. A noble fungus helps dehydrate these grapes on the vine, making sweet and tangy wines that smell like peach crème brûlée.
